Curious about what goes into making beer at home? The Amarillo High Plains Drafters have scheduled a public demonstration where visitors can watch members brew and ask questions about the process.

The club's event listing sets the demonstration for Saturday, Nov. 7, from 10 a.m. until about 2 p.m. at Amarillo Brewing Supply, 6650 Canyon Drive, Suite 2, in Amarillo. Admission is free, but the event is limited to people 21 and older. The listing says lunch is planned around noon; it does not specify whether lunch is included or available for purchase.

Rather than requiring visitors to arrive with brewing experience, the event is presented as a chance to see different brewing methods and equipment up close. The club says its gatherings welcome people at every stage, including those who have never brewed before. That makes the demonstration a useful starting point for anyone weighing whether homebrewing is a hobby they would like to explore.

Amarillo Brewing Supply is identified by the club as the event sponsor. According to the event page, owner Danny Henry will be available to discuss the store and homebrewing, and ingredients and equipment will be available to explore and purchase on-site. The listing does not provide prices, so anyone considering a purchase should check directly with the store.

For first-time visitors, the schedule leaves several hours to watch and ask questions rather than treating the demonstration as a brief presentation. It may be worth arriving early if you want to see more of the brewing process, and planning around the age restriction and the approximate lunch time.

The club's event page and homepage list Nov. 7 as the date. An outside community-calendar listing contains a conflicting November 1 reference in its closing paragraph, so check the club's listing before setting out in case of a change or cancellation. The information here reflects the club's public event listing as checked Nov. 2, 2026; it is a scheduled event, not a report that it has already taken place.
